Digital Culture is what the use of technology to connect with others; it allows us to connect with one and other so much easier than before. In this day and age we have so many different opportunities to connect via the digital world. Culture is created through people's innate desire to share and connect with others. These connections can be made in a variety of different means; social media, dating websites, and sites such as YouTube, Metcafe, and other video sharing websites have created a amazing sources of sharing that was unimaginable at the dawn of the new millennia. Our digital culture is also evolving with time, as we know digitized most of the workplace. Not only is the digital culture a social culture but also a means of economic sharing and transferring. We have evolved as a culture to embrace the technological advances of the last twenty years and with that our digital culture has emerged to connect and unite us in a way never seen before!

What do all of these images have in common? They all represent some of the many faces of the digital world and by extension our digital culture overall. These sites all have a fundamental goal; to connect and help share with as many people as possible! That is what digital culture truly is in a nutshell in my opinion, one big massive web of connections.
